

Schlepping non-kosher wine for payment

Are you allowed to work as a schlepper for a non-kosher wine store to transport boxes of wine? Alternatively, if you own a rental car company or lease storage space, are you allowed to rent out a car or lease space to a non-Jewish winery, which will use your car/space to transport/store the wine?

One might think that since you are not directly benefiting from the wine, it is permitted even according to the S"A. However, the S"A in סימן קלג-א passkins that all the above cases are forbidden. Even if you already took the job and were paid cash, you are obligated to destroy the payment. The (ש"ך א) there explains, based on the גמרא ע"ז (סו.ב), that there is an extra קנס – fine, prohibiting even indirect benefit from stam yeinam.¹ The Rama, however, references our siman where he passkins that today, some allow benefiting directly from stam yeinam. According to those opinions, explains the Rama, the above scenarios of indirectly benefiting would certainly be permitted. One only needs to be machmir not to benefit from the payment for, or indirect benefit of, actual נסך, not stam yeinam. The (ש"ך ד) disagrees with the Rama and passkins that le'chatchilla a person should not provide services (i.e., schlepping) or rent out equipment (such as his car/space) to be used for stam yeinam. The (אהל יעקב קכג-ו) passkins like this le'chatchilla, and passkins like the Rama only b'dieved if the job was already completed.

Buying kosher wine from a Jewish-owned store selling non-kosher wine

In Israel, there are unfortunately some Jewish-owned wine stores that sell both kosher and non-kosher wines. We learned in the previous subsection that according to the S"A, any money earned from stam yeinam must be destroyed since benefitting from it is prohibited, and the ש"ך passkins that it is best to be stringent.

The 16) (תשובות והנהגות ח"ב-שצז) writes that according to the S"A and ש"ך, it is probable that much of the money in the cash register of such stores is prohibited, as it was obtained from selling stam yeinam. If you purchase kosher wine with cash from the store, the change you receive may be forbidden. Therefore, it is advisable to pay with a credit card or exact change.² If, however, the store is owned by a non-Jew, the money

² The תשובות והנהגות suggests that maybe even the kosher wine is prohibited because the money the store owner received from selling non-kosher wine (which is forbidden) was used to purchase the kosher wine, and now the kosher wine has the status of the money, which is forbidden. On the other hand, he writes that perhaps we are not machmir regarding stam yeinam to the extent that the "purchase of the purchase" (i.e., the kosher wine, bought earned from selling non-kosher wine is not forbidden since the owner is not subject to the prohibition of benefiting from stam yeinam.

Buying kosher wine from a non-Jewish store

We learned above that Chazal forbade stam yeinam (wine owned by a non-Jew) to prevent intermarriage. If so, are you allowed to buy kosher wine with a hechsher from a store that is owned by non-Jews? For example, if your local non-Jewish winery or Wal-Mart sells kosher wine, are you allowed to buy it?

We can answer the question by examining the משנה עבודה זרה (סא) and the S"A סימן קלא-א, where it is passkined that under certain conditions (i.e., ensuring the non-Jew never touches the wine), a Jew may use a non-Jewish winery in order to produce kosher wine. The 17) (רש"ט (ע"ז נה.) asks: even if the non-Jew never touches the wine, shouldn't it should still be forbidden as stam yeinam because it is owned by a non-Jew?

The רש"ט answers that stam yeinam is similar to pas akum – it is only forbidden when the entire process begins and ends under non-Jewish ownership. As the S"A in סימן קיב-ז passkins, kosher bread (made entirely by a Jew) which is sold to a non-Jew is permitted. Therefore, if a Jew produces the wine in a non-Jewish winery and owns it in the final stages of the process, and certainly if the wine was produced entirely by a Jew and only later sold to a non-Jew, it remains permitted.³ This is explicit in the S"A סימן קלא-ב, which permits wine bought by a non-Jew from a Jew to sell in a different location (even though the non-Jew is the full owner). However, the S"A adds that the wine is permitted only if it has two seals, ensuring that the non-Jew did not touch it in transit.

Ha'Gaon Rav Neventzal shlit"a in עמ' שלט (מציון תצא תורה) passkins that one is allowed to buy kosher wine from a Wal-Mart or non-Jewish winery. Thus, if one sold kosher wine to a non-Jew as part of selling chametz before Pesach, the wine remains permitted when it is repurchased after Pesach.

C. The Severity of Stam Yeinam with money that was received in exchange for non-kosher wine) is also forbidden. Furthermore, today, the store owner often pays digitally and not with cash.

³ See also ק (חיי ברוך (ע"ז עמ' ק who writes that if a wine is made kosher and later sold to a non-Jew, if we are certain he did not touch it, it remains permitted.

We mentioned above that although the prohibition of stam yeinam is rabbinic, Chazal were particularly stringent about it and even forbade deriving benefit. The חכמת (18) (כלל עה-א) אדם reinforces this idea when he writes that although the gezeirah of stam yeinam is rabbinic, which might lead some to take it lightly, one who drinks stam yeinam is considered to be uprooting his soul from its source, and the mekubalim elaborate at great length about the severity of the punishment received for drinking stam yeinam. In fact, the Rama at the end of סעיף כו writes that if one accidentally drank stam yeinam, some require him to fast 5 times.

In this context, the 19) (שנה ב בלק-א) בן איש חי writes that although Chazal explained the reason for stam yeinam as preventing intermarriage, there are, in truth, much greater hidden reasons that Chazal did not want to reveal. Therefore, even if the reasons given by Chazal no longer apply, the gezeirah remains intact, and one who is lenient uproots his soul from its source.

The 20) (שלי"ה) (שער האותיות ק- קדושת אכילה טו) quotes Rav Menachem Habavli, who is even more stringent that one should not drink Jewish-owned wine that a non-Jew has looked at and seen "its color."⁴ The 21) (קכג-יד) אהל יעקב (קכג-יד) quotes a dispute according to those who follow the שלי"ה whether this stringency applies even when the non-Jew looks through a glass bottle – some are stringent, while others are lenient. Nevertheless, he writes later in the sefer that some argue that looking cannot be more stringent than touching, so if the wine is sealed in a way that prevents it from becoming forbidden by touching, it is likewise not forbidden by sight. Furthermore, some are only stringent with wine intended to be used for a mitzvah. But lema'ase, Rav Elyashiv in 22) (אשרי האיש יו"ד פ"ח-יט) passkins that m'ikar ha'din, wine that a non-Jew merely looked at is always permitted, and it becomes forbidden only if the wine is touched by a non-Jew. However, what we learn from the above is the severity of this prohibition and the need to be especially careful not to, ח"ו, transgress it.

D. יין נסך and Stam Yeinam for Those Who are Sick

⁴ For this reason, many kosher wine companies package their wine in tinted bottles so that even if it is sold in a store with non-Jewish employees, it will not become forbidden.

In this section, we will continue discussing the subject of benefit from יין נסך and stam yeinam and focus on whether drinking or benefiting from them is ever permitted for someone who is ill. One of the most famous גמרות in Shas is the (גמרא סנהדרין (עד. 23)), which teaches that if a non-Jew forces a Jew to choose between death and transgressing a prohibition (in private), the halacha is that the Jew is obligated to transgress the prohibition rather than sacrifice his life. The only exceptions are where the non-Jew forces the Jew to choose between death and worshipping avodah zarah, killing another Jew, or גילוי עריות. In such cases, he must give up his life and not transgress the prohibition. In this section, we will discuss the status of יין נסך in this context and whether a deathly ill person may drink it in order to save his life. We will also discuss the status of stam yeinam and whether a sick Jew whose life is not in danger may consume it.

I. Is יין נסך included in יעבור ואל יהרג?

The (בית יוסף) (קכג), in the בדק הבית, quotes the ארחות חיים who passkins that even a sick person in life-threatening condition in need of wine in order to be healed may not use יין נסך. However, the S"A in סימן קנה-ב passkins that one is obligated to give up his life and not benefit from avodah zarah only when the non-Jewish doctor specifically says: "take water or the tree of this avodah zarah," which implies that the avodah zarah is doing the healing. If, however, the doctor simply instructs the Jew to take this water or tree without mentioning the avodah zarah, he may even take water or trees used for avodah zarah. The (שי"ך) (י) passkins that the same applies to יין נסך: If the non-Jewish doctor specifically tells the Jew to use יין נסך, the Jew may not use it, even in a situation of פיקוח נפש, but if he just says to take wine, יין נסך may be used to save his life. The reason is that in this case, the healing is not attributed to avodah zarah.

II. Can a sick individual drink stam yeinam for medical purposes?

The (שי"ך) (סימן קנה-י) passkins that if one's life is in danger, one may certainly drink stam yeinam, since it is a rabbinic prohibition, which is overridden by פיקוח נפש. What is the halacha regarding a sick individual whose life is not in danger? Is he allowed to drink stam yeinam for medical purposes? For example, may someone suffering from headaches drink stam yeinam if recommended by doctors to alleviate the pain? Alternatively, may one who often engages in natural remedies use stam yeinam in a bath to alleviate a rash?

The (בית יוסף) (24) quotes the רשב"א, who passkins that there is never a heter to consume rabbinically forbidden food for a non-dangerous illness. Therefore, drinking stam yeinam is forbidden. The רשב"א adds that even bathing in or anointing oneself with stam yeinam for medical reasons is rabbinically forbidden due to the principle of "סיכה כשתיה" – "anointing is considered like drinking," because it is absorbed in the skin. Thus, according to the רשב"א, even if benefiting from stam yeinam today is permitted, anointing is still forbidden.

The S"A in סימן קכג סעיף ב' passkins like the רשב"א that a חולה שאין בו סכנה – a sick person whose life is not in danger, may not bathe in stam yeinam (and certainly may not drink it). The Rama, however, points to סימן קנה"ג, where he passkins that a sick person may bathe in or anoint himself with stam yeinam, though drinking is prohibited. The (גר"א יז) there explains that according to the Rama, benefiting today from stam yeinam is permitted, and the halacha of סיכה כשתיה – anointing/bathing is halachically considered drinking, is rabbinic, and Chazal did not apply this concept to one who is ill. In other words, the Rama would agree that a sick individual may not drink stam yeinam for medical reasons, but he would allow anointing or bathing in stam yeinam for medical reasons.

Practical Applications

Resveratrol supplements

Resveratrol is an antioxidant found in red wine and is commonly marketed as being beneficial for the heart and for anti-aging and anti-inflammatory purposes (though its actual effectiveness is debated). Is one allowed to take these supplements, which contain actual wine? It would seem that both the S"A and Rama would agree that these pills are prohibited if they contain stam yeinam because a חולה שאין בו סכנה may not consume stam yeinam even for medical purposes. Furthermore, these supplements are more similar to vitamins, which are not consumed to treat a medical condition but rather as a preventative measure, and are therefore prohibited for consumption without a reliable hechsher.⁵

Resveratrol creams

Resveratrol creams are marketed as creams that reduce signs of skin aging and are usually used as an overnight cream. If they contain stam yeinam, it should be prohibited according to all opinions. The S"A would prohibit because bathing/anointing with stam yeinam is forbidden, while even the Rama is only lenient concerning a חולה שאין בו סכנה, but would not permit here, because having wrinkles on your face is not considered being sick. However, the majority of resveratrol creams only contain 0.25%-1% of resveratrol, which would be batel b'shishim, and even the S"A would permit.⁶

Grapeseed oil

Pure Grapeseed oil is used both for cooking and cosmetic purposes. Does it require a hechsher when used for either cosmetic or culinary purposes?

The S"A in יד סעיף יד passkins that grape seeds, peels and sediment from stam yeinam is forbidden unless they were washed and then dried for 12 months, ensuring that no stam yeinam residue remains. Today, most grapeseed oil is produced from seeds that were not dried for 12 months, and would therefore seemingly be prohibited. However, in order to answer this question more definitively, we need to better understand how grapeseed oil is produced today.

Grapeseed oil is generally produced from grape seeds that remain after grapes are crushed for winemaking.⁷ The seeds are separated from the grape pulp and skins and then dried, either naturally in the sun or through hot-air drying systems, in order to remove moisture, prevent mold, and improve the extraction of the oil. The dried seeds are then crushed under high pressure to extract the oil. Producing pure grapeseed oil requires an enormous quantity of grape seeds; a single 500 ml bottle may require 5-10 pounds of seeds, which are produced from approximately 100-250 pounds of grapes. See video: bit.ly/SCPgrapeseedOil

The 25) (חתם סופר (י"ד-ק"ז)) offers two reasons to permit non-Jewish grapeseed oil, even when the grapes have not been dried for 12 months. First, the S"A only forbids consuming the grapeseed itself, but the oil extracted from it is permitted because it is considered a new entity, and according to רבינו יונה, once an item is completely transformed, we evaluate it based on its current state.⁸ Second, even if some wine is absorbed in the oil, it is not tasted and is therefore batel. The עמק התשובה (ח"ה-סח) (26)) adds that today, grapeseed oil involves heating the seeds in an oven that reaches very high temperatures (around 400°C), which burns away any possible residual wine in the seed, and is an even stronger process than drying outside for 12 months.

⁷ If seeds are extrapolated from the grapes before they are made into wine, the grape seeds and grapeseed oil are surely permitted.

⁸ We learned this opinion of Rabbeinu Yonah when discussing whether gelatin is permitted, where some poskim suggested that gelatin is permitted because it is "a new creation." But there are many poskim who do not rely on this (שו"ת הר צבי (י"ד-קב); see רבינו יונה).

Accordingly, he concludes that there is no issue of stam yeinam regarding grapeseed oil. Rav Ovadya, in (יביע אומר (ח"ז-יא), also permits grapeseed oil.

What emerges from here is that grapeseed oil may be used for cosmetic purposes without a hechsher and grapeseed oil used for consumption is not included in the prohibition of stam yeinam. Nevertheless, a hechsher is still needed for consumption in order to ensure that kosher keilim were used in the production of the oil and that no non-kosher additives were added.

E. Mevushal Wine

In this section, we will learn about whether the prohibition of stam yeinam applies to mevushal wine. We will also learn at what temperature wine becomes "mevushal" and whether pasteurization is considered "mevushal." As usual, we will start with the earliest sources and work our way down to the modern day poskim.

I. Reasons to permit

The 27) (גמרא עבודה זרה (כט:) teaches that if a non-Jew cooks his wine (i.e., stam yeinam), it remains forbidden because cooking cannot abolish an already existing prohibition. However, if a non-Jew touches mevushal wine belonging to a Jew, the wine remains permitted. Rashi explains that mevushal wine is permitted because a non-Jew would not offer it for libation.⁹ Based on this, the Gemara concludes you are allowed to leave mevushal wine in the house of a non-Jew with only one seal.¹⁰ There is no concern that the non-Jew will use it for libation since it is mevushal, and there is no concern that he will replace your wine with his, because he would not go through the trouble of replacing your seal.

The Gemara also relates that שמואל was once sitting with a non-Jewish scholar named אבלט, and when wine was served, אבלט was careful not to touch it so as not to render it forbidden. However, שמואל told him that he was allowed to touch the wine because it was mevushal, and a non-Jew cannot forbid mevushal wine.

¹⁰ Normally, a double seal is required for the wine to be permitted.

The 28) (פ"ב-יג) (רא"ש) asks that it is understandable why one may benefit from mevushal wine – because it would not be offered for libation, but why would mevushal wine be permitted to drink?¹¹ Shouldn't it still be forbidden because it leads to intermarriage? As we learned above, Chazal forbade drinking stam yeinam to prevent intermarriage, and they also forbade benefiting from it because of יין נסך. Even if the gezeirah of יין נסך is no longer applicable to mevushal wine because gentiles would not offer it for libation, the wine should still be forbidden to drink because of the concern of intermarriage!

There are several answers to this question. We will mention two from the Rishonim and one from the Acharonim: 1) The (פ"ב-יג) (רא"ש) answers that "perhaps" mevushal wine of a non-Jew was never included in the prohibition to drink because it was uncommon, and Chazal did not institute a decree in uncommon situations. This would follow the rule of מילתא דלא שכיחא לא גזרו בה רבנן – Chazal do not enact decrees in uncommon situations. Furthermore, Chazal did not prohibit deriving benefit from mevushal wine touched by a non-Jew out of concern that it may have been used for libation, since, as the Gemara explains, non-Jews do not use mevushal wine for libations. The 29) (ע"ז כט: ד"ה אמר) (ריטב"א) elaborates that mevushal wine was never included in the gezeirah because it was only drunk occasionally for pleasure and was not commonly used.

RSZA in (קמא-כה) (מנחת שלמה) clarifies that although today mevushal wine is common, it is still permitted because Chazal never included it in the initial gezeirah. If we would forbid it now, it would be considered creating a new gezeirah, which we lack the authority to do today (though see Rav Elyashiv quoted below, who argues on this).

RSZA brings two proofs to this idea that once an uncommon circumstance is not included in a gezeirah, it may not be added later, even if it becomes common. First, regarding Shabbos, Chazal never forbade using rocks for *hatmana*¹² since it was uncommon to use them, as they would damage the pots. However, Tosfos in בבא בתרא (יט. ד"ה משום) writes that in his day, it was common to use rocks to insulate food (presumably because their pots were strong and would not get damaged by the rocks), and yet, hatmana with rocks was still permitted. RSZA explains that since rocks were never included in the gezeirah of hatmana, we do not have the ability to add them now. The second proof is that when a woman sees a כתם, a stain of blood on her clothing less than the size of a gris (a bedbug) and without any internal feeling (hargasha), she does not become a niddah because bed bugs were common in those days, and it is possible that the stain is from a bug. Even today, when bedbugs are less common, a כתם less than a gris is still permitted because we cannot add to the gezeirah.

¹¹ However, Rashi seems to imply that it is forbidden to drink.

¹² Hatmana, or insulating a pot on Shabbos, is forbidden lest you come to heat up the pot with fire and stoke the coals.

2) The 30) (רמב"ן (ע"ז ל.) answers that mevushal wine may even be drunk because it is not considered wine at all, and it was therefore not included in the gezeirah. In other words, when the Gemara states that mevushal wine is not offered as a libation and is not forbidden when touched by a non-Jew, the Gemara is teaching that mevushal wine is not considered wine at all, and thus, it may even be drunk.

3) The third answer is given by רע"א and offers a completely different understanding of the prohibition of stam yeinam. Until now, we explained that both stam yeinam and Jewish-owned wine touched by a non-Jew are forbidden to drink due to concern for intermarriage and forbidden to benefit from because it may be confused with יין נסך. However, רע"א explains that Jewish-owned wine touched by a non-Jew is only forbidden because of יין נסך (i.e., out of concern they might think to offer it as libation), but there is no concern of intermarriage because the wine belongs to a Jew. Therefore, mevushal wine touched by a non-Jew is permitted because the non-Jew would never think to offer it for libation. However, mevushal stam yeinam, which is wine owned by a non-Jew, is still forbidden to drink because it may lead to intermarriage. According to רע"א, the question of the ש"א that wine touched by a non-Jew should be forbidden to drink because of intermarriage does not begin, because, in fact, wine touched by a non-Jew was never forbidden due to intermarriage.

What emerges from here is that according to רע"א, mevushal wine owned by a Jew is permitted if touched by a non-Jew, but mevushal stam yeinam (i.e., mevushal wine owned by a non-Jew) is prohibited because the concern for intermarriage still exists. According to the רמב"ן and רא"ש/ריטב"א, even mevushal stam yeinam is allowed (as explained above). It should be noted that cases of mevushal stam yeinam (i.e., mevushal wine owned by a non-Jew) are relatively uncommon, because a non-Jew's wine is already forbidden before it is cooked, and cooking does not remove that status. Additionally, even if a non-Jew buys kosher wine, the moment he opens it, it becomes stam yeinam, even if it is later cooked.

A common case of mevushal stam yeinam owned by a non-Jew is where the non-Jew buys a bottle of kosher mevushal wine and opens it. For example, if a non-Jewish coworker takes you out for dinner in a kosher restaurant and buys you mevushal wine that he opens and pours for you, רע"א would forbid drinking it because it is considered stam yeinam. Thus, the bishul only removes the concern of יין נסך, but not the concern for intermarriage. However, the רא"ש/ריטב"א and רמב"ן would permit because mevushal wine was not included in the gezeirah at all.

The S"A in סעיף ג passkins based on the Gemara and Rishonim above that Jewish-owned mevushal wine touched by a non-Jew is permitted. The (ש"ך ו) explains that it may be consumed le'chatchilla, even together with a non-Jew. It seems from the S"A, as explained by the (ט"ז ג), that even mevushal stam yeinam is permitted for consumption. Thus, if a non-Jew takes you out to dinner in a kosher restaurant, buys mevushal wine and pours it for you, you may still drink it. (In general, if one is concerned about non-Jews touching his wine, using mevushal wine avoids the problem in most situations. Towards the end of the zman, we will discuss the question of leaving wine unattended with a non-Jew, such as a cleaning lady.)

II. Temperature of "bishul"

The next question that must be addressed is: At what temperature does the wine become mevushal? The (רא"ש 28) writes that once the wine is "heated – הרתיחו", it is considered mevushal. The (בית יוסף 31) quotes the ר"ן, who quotes the רמב"ן as saying that in order for wine to be considered mevushal, it needs to partially evaporate. Although this sounds somewhat different from the approach of the רא"ש, the ר"ן suggests that there might not be any dispute between the two, and whenever wine is "heated," it also partially evaporates. The בית יוסף also quotes the רשב"א who writes similarly: Some define mevushal as wine that has been heated, while others define it as wine that has begun to evaporate; however, the רשב"א explains that once wine is heated, it naturally begins to evaporate.

The S"A in סעיף ג' passkins that wine is considered mevushal once it is heated, and the (ש"ך ז) quotes the ר"ן and רשב"א, who maintain that the wine must evaporate a bit. RSZA in 32) (מנחת שלמה (קמא-כה) explains based on the גר"א, who references the prohibition of cooking on Shabbos, that this temperature is yad soledes bo. Accordingly, when the S"A, quoting the רא"ש, uses the term "heated," which the ש"ך says means it begins to evaporate (like רשב"א/ר"ן), he is referring to the wine reaching a temperature of yad soledes bo — hot enough to cause some evaporation — even if it does not actually boil.

Rav Moshe in 33) (אגרו"מ (יו"ד ח"ג-לא) also passkins that wine becomes mevushal once it reaches yad soledes bo. This is the view of Rav Ovadya Yosef as well in יביע אומר (ח"ח-יו"ד טו). However, the (ילקוט יוסף (יו"ד ח"א סימן סג-כג) 34) passkins that wine is only considered mevushal if it has been boiled to the point that the reduction is noticeable, thereby causing a change in the wine's flavor. He writes that it is best to be machmir, though bedieved, one may be lenient and consider yad soledes bo as the definition for mevushal.

Lema'ase, what is the actual temperature of mevushal? There are a variety of opinions in the Acharonim about this question.¹³ Rav Belsky in שולחן הלוי (ח"א 35) (פכ"ה-שאלה ד) understands Rav Moshe in one place to hold 160°F/71°C is considered yad soledes bo/mevushal, while elsewhere he writes that it is about 175°F/79.4°C. Rav Belsky explains that Rav Moshe was passkining that lema'ase one should follow the 175°F measurement. Some posskim are more lenient than Rav Moshe, and others are more stringent and require a higher temperature.

¹³ To list a few: the (ח"ז-רלד:ב) (שבט הלוי) writes that it is between 190°-212° F, and the (ח"ב-כ, הערה יח) (אור לציון) writes that it is 70° C.
